| Beschreibung   |
| Why do European responses to Donald Trump's transatlantic demands differ? This seminar looks at the reactions of EU member states to core policy proposals of President Trump in 2025 and investigates the domestic societal driving forces for the international positions of democratically accountable governments. The seminar employs the Liberal Theory of IR and the Societal Approach to governmental preference formation and examines the correlation between governmental positions on Trump's policy proposals on trade and defense with domestic societal demands in France, Germany, Italy and Poland. In addition to the material interests of lobby groups and the ideational expectations of voters, the seminar considers the ideology of the governing party, which can impact government preferences. Implications for Transatlantic relations and European integration conclude the seminar. In sum, this seminar contributes to European studies by analyzing the domestic driving forces for EU member states' positions towards new transatlantic challenges in trade and defense.  |
